Chapter 6

* There were class tensions between the planters and merchants over tobacco and the slave trade.
* The Crown supported the lower class (merchants).
* Planters controlled the economy and the Crown was trying to get the debt they never paid.
* The Stint Act of 1723 had to do with tobacco; since the amount of tobacco was decreasing, planters wanted to limit the number of plants.
  * By doing this, they even hoped to acquire more blacks. This act, however, did not improve their debt like they had hoped.
